UNION SEES A GAIN IN CHAVEZ PROTEST

But Leaders Also Express Concern for His Health

By Nat Littleton

NEW YORK TIMES

Published: December 6, 1970

Copyright © The New York Times

The United Farm Workers Union, the official voice of the striking workers, has been joined in the convulsions of that new national boycott of lettuce that does not seem to be going away. The union's leaders are far from pleased by the developments of the boycott and are worried about its effects on the health and safety of Mr. Chavez.

The union leaders are concerned about the state of Mr. Chavez's health and safety of Mr. Chavez and his family. He has been the subject of a national boycott campaign and has been a civil rights leader for many years. The union leaders are concerned about the mental and physical stress that he has been subjected to in the midst of the boycott.

The boycott has caused a major disruption in the lives of the workers. Many of them have lost their jobs and have been forced to rely on government assistance. The union leaders are calling on the boycotters to end their campaign and allow the workers to return to their jobs.

The boycott has also caused a major disruption in the supply chain. Many of the workers have been unable to deliver their produce to the markets and have been forced to store large quantities of lettuce in their fields. The union leaders are calling on the boycotters to end their campaign and allow the workers to deliver their produce to the markets.

The union leaders are calling on the boycotters to end their campaign and allow the workers to return to their jobs and deliver their produce to the markets. They are also calling on the government to provide the workers with financial assistance and to ensure that their rights are protected.

Meanwhile, the workers are facing a difficult time. Many of them have been unable to find other jobs and have been forced to rely on government assistance. The union leaders are calling on the government to provide financial assistance to the workers and to ensure that their rights are protected.

The union leaders are also calling on the boycotters to end their campaign and allow the workers to return to their jobs and deliver their produce to the markets. They are also calling on the government to provide financial assistance to the workers and to ensure that their rights are protected.