Lettuce Boycott Shows Signs of Gaining After Lagging for Its First Three Months

Oscar Chaver's nationwide consumer boycott of lettuce began or ended in September, depending on who is asked. At any rate, it has been a rather slow-burning affair. It is estimated that up to 75 percent of the lettuce bought and eaten in the United States is grown in California, and at least 75 percent of this is grown in the Imperial Valley and the Coachella Valley of southern California. The boycott is thought to have been effective in reducing the amount of lettuce eaten in California, but it is not certain if this is because the lettuce is being boycotted, or because there are fewer people to eat it. The boycott has been marked by a number of public protests, including the burning of lettuce in the streets of Los Angeles and the arrest of a number of protesters. The boycott is supported by a number of organizations, including the United Farm Workers, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the National Farmers Union. The boycott has been opposed by a number of safari and farm owners, who argue that the boycott will hurt the economy and lead to higher prices. The boycott has been a controversial issue, with some people feeling that it is a waste of time and resources, while others feel that it is a way to bring attention to the plight of farm workers and to force the government to do something about their working conditions.
