Chavez Joins With Puerto Rican Group in East

The United Farm Workers of America has announced that it would enter into an agreement last week with the prestigious Puerto Rican Independent Workers Union of Puerto Rico.

The 30,000-member UFW agreed that agreement last week, an informed source said, with the 6,000-member Association de Traba. The 30,000-member UFW, according to an informed source, has been called the "Puerto Rican Independent Workers Union." The source added that both the unions have been calling for the resignation of the current administration and that the two unions have been discussing the possibility of a merger for some time.

The merger will be effective immediately, the source said, with the merger being announced today. The new union will be called the "United Farm Workers of Puerto Rico." The new union will have a membership of 36,000, the source said.

The merger is the first of its kind in the United States, the source said, and it is expected to have a major impact on the farm labor movement. The new union will have a strong presence in the Midwest, where it will be able to negotiate with the large agricultural corporations that operate there.

Organize One Movement

The merger is also considered a major step forward in the organizing efforts of the UFW, the source said. The UFW has been organizing farm workers in the United States for many years, and the merger of the two unions will give the UFW a much stronger presence in the Puerto Rican labor market.

Mr. Bizzirai, the 28-year-old UFW leader, said that the merger would make the union stronger and more able to negotiate with the large agricultural corporations that operate in the United States.
